TOPIC: ASK QUESTIONS: Self learning and Confidence for employability

DATE: 01.02.2023

RESOURCE PERSON: Orlanda Ruthven

About the Resource Person: Ms Orlanda Ruthven is a trainer, researcher and advisor working in the field of skill, employability and work entitlements. She has been based in India for many years and worked with Gram Tarang and CUTM between 2012 and 2016. She is based in Delhi.

The purpose of the session was to model how Q&A can become the main format of a lesson. While a lesson of teacher-led content may have a few students asking questions to 'clear doubts', here, we provide a relatively short 'prompt' (in this case, a short film, a statement from a primary source etc) and then get the kids asking and answering questions, to enquire, to self-discover, collaborate, and develop their thinking skills.

There are multiple gains from building the questioning skills of students, such as: -

- learning readiness: asking questions around a yet-to-be taught topic makes for a more fertile ground for learning once the topic starts.
- deepening learning: in asking questions, we link the new information to what we already know, which helps us to absorb, reflect on and retain it more deeply.
- efficient learning: students who ask questions procure the information they need when they need it, so they will learn faster.
- broadening class participation and peer learning: class members have immense knowledge and experience between them. We can harness this through a Q&A culture. We MUST NOT depend on a small minority of (English speaking) students in the front row (and we must not assume they have better 'thinking' skills just because they speak better English!). Participation will bubble up if we permit language of choice and if we are persistent and broad-based in pushing it.

- signalling to employers: asking well formulated questions is well liked by employers who are reassured that a student is curious and engaged, is able to find out what they need to know and to process and make sense of new information.
